Section B – Core Ideologies Extract Question

Read the extracts below and answer question 4 that follows.

Methods to achieve SocialismExtract 1*Reform or revolution?

Legislative reform and revolution are different factors in the development of class society. They condition and complement each other, and are at the same time exclusive of each other, as are the bourgeoisie and the proletariat. Every legal constitution is the product of a revolution. In the history of classes, revolution is the act of political creation, while legislation is the political expression of the life of a society that has already come into being.

The development of democracy brings some sort of “people’s state”. But this participation takes the form of bourgeois parliamentary democracy, where class conflicts and class domination are not done away with, but are, on the contrary, displayed in the open. Exactly for this reason must the proletariat seize political power and suppress completely the capitalist system.

Extract adapted from Reform or Revolution, by Rosa Luxemburg, 1899.

Extract 2The dangers of revolution

The United Kingdom and the USA should study the USSR to avoid its mistakes. Because of Great Britain’s unified and stabilised population and unwritten constitution, which permit every possible alteration, the establishment of a new social order need not involve violent upheaval against despotic and corrupt government as it did in Tsarist Russia.

Thus, the British people will be able to avoid the crudities and cruelties inherent in sudden and violent revolution. On the other hand, to carry out social reconstruction it will be desirable to study the bolder experiments in the USSR owing to the fact the government swept away the remnants of the old social order.

Extract adapted from The Truth about Soviet Russia, co-authored by Beatrice Webb, 1942.
